Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: ... is the intention of the Worlds Fair commission to make still further explorations. Mr. Potter, who has had much experience in explorations in Mexico and South America, estimates that the antiquity of these remains date back 10,000 years, but one-fourth that period is probably about the actual time. He also says that there is a chain of ancient cities running from Cache Valley down to St. George. The Smithsonian Institute sent a man out last winter, but he did not make any very extensive explorations at this place, most of his time being devoted to the southern part of the Territory. Three caves, which are reached by a narrow entrance, have been discovered in American Fork Canyon, about two miles from its mouth. The larger one is thus described by one of an exploring party which penetrated its dark recesses: .The tomblike stillness is broken by the spattering of the drops of water which ooze through crevices in the mighty hanging wall. There is an excellent chance to get lost, for the chambers are many and the passages narrow. The floor is extremely rough, and the flickering light of our candles revealed an abundance of nooks and holes, the full extent of which was in many instances beyond human vision under the conditions surrounding us. Above, beneath, and all around, as we moved from chamber to chamber, were white monuments, the appearance of which reminded us strongly of a churchyard by moonlight, but that they had taken upon them the most fantastic shapes, as the columns were gradually formed by the slowly dripping water. In places the roof looks like a ceiling draped with delicately-woven lace curtains, reaching from pillar to pillar. Some of the formation is white as the driven snow, and some of it a rich yellow; wax could not be placed among ...
