

May A Christian Practice Tai Chi?

Many Christians have significant fears and concerns about various Asian practices they've had little experience with, such as taiji (often spelled tai chi), yoga, qigong, meditation and acupuncture. The fear is understandable: Christians are commanded not to distort the Faith and thereby drift into heresy, apostasy or the worship of other gods. This essay addresses these legitimate concerns and describes a perspective that not only allows for the study of Asian arts and health practices but also shows why such study can serve as an important extension of the Gospel. This essay can also help non-Christians begin to understand how traditional Christians address a variety of secular issues. Christian logic and reasoning is often a puzzle for non-Christians. There are a number of Christian teachers of taiji, yoga and other Asian health practices and disciplines who have non-Christian students. These students can benefit from understanding how their instructor thinks, even if they themselves do not adhere to their instructor's religious convictions.
